Abstract

Contextual learning model design through collaboration between lecturers, students, and village governments in nursing education

Purpose: This study aims to develop a contextual learning model design through collaboration between lecturers, students, and the village government for nursing education. Methods: This study used a qualitative design. The process of collecting data, was through focus group discussions (FGD) with 12 informants representing four stakeholders. There are four focus groups, namely universities, village governments, community health centers, and students. The discussion used open-ended questions which were developed through two parameters, namely learning outcomes and learning activities. Data analysis used thematic analysis. Results: There are 11 grouped concepts found in this study which are divided into three categories. The learning achievement category is formed by four concepts, including attitudes, mastery of knowledge, skills, and values. The learning process category is formed by five concepts namely, learning resources, learning methods and forms, learning media, learning time, and learning subjects. The main sources of contextual learning are programs and maternal and child health (MCH) issues in the village. Techniques and instruments are two concepts in the assessment category. Contextual learning models in nursing education to integrate the MCH program with learning outcomes. Conclusion: These concepts are the initial framework for the head of the study program to integrate maternally and child health programs and cases in the curriculum. And facilitate contextualization of knowledge in nursing students.

#2 reviewer :
The topic is of immediate importance for the local health education. The study will be indicative for the local nursing education reform and will potentially help to improve the quality of health care service significantly for the local rural areas.
The manuscript is understandable, but academic editing service is recommended to smoothen up the writing.
Three categories are mentioned but only two categories have been described in the abstract. This causes confusion for the readers.
The same problem occurred in the discussion section where only two categories have their own subtitle, and the third category, the assessment, is largely omitted.
Assessment component is extremely important for the curriculum design from the very beginning, and it is essential for the successful nursing curriculum. More substantial discussion should be included for this area.

After the revision, the writing is smoother.

For result part, the first subtitle is called learning outcomes, which is different from the first category 'learning achievement'.
This is a bit confusing. I would suggest to change the first subtitle of the result part to Learning achievement.

With the added discussion of the assessment category, the paper now is more comprehensive.

Thank you for the final confirmation of our script. I've read the names, affiliations, some of the fixes we've made, and details on the overall manuscript. I certify that the detailed manuscript complies with the recommended fix.

Thank you
Best regards
