ABSTRACT

Father's parenting plays an important role in shaping children's character, personality, and religious values. Democratic parenting, characterized by warmth, open communication, and the granting of freedom accompanied by responsibility, is expected to support the development of adolescents' religiosity. This study aims to examine the relationship between fathers' democratic parenting and early adolescents' religiosity. The research employed a quantitative approach with a correlational design. The subjects consisted of 80 students of Madrasah Tsanawiyah who were raised by fathers with a democratic parenting style. The instruments used were the democratic parenting scale ($\alpha = 0.889$) and the religiosity scale ($\alpha = 0.885$). Data were analyzed using the Pearson Product Moment correlation technique, yielding a result of $r = -0.115$ with a significance value of 0.312 ($p > 0.05$). The findings indicate that there is no significant relationship between fathers' democratic parenting and adolescents' religiosity. Descriptively, 51% of respondents were categorized as having high democratic parenting, while 53% were categorized as having low religiosity.
